

This is a pictorial representation of overlaying David Sousa’s brain theory work with instructional models to provide some clarity to teachers in training of why we structure lessons in certain ways. It’s not meant as an absolute must do but as a guide. My first overlay is about lesson transitions, which are times when students move around classrooms between or during lessons. Reducing both time and noise in transitions should be a target for most teachers in training.

